

Before the Indiana no-call list, nuisance calls at my home were averaging six or more a day. It was so bad that I stopped answering my phone altogether, letting an answering machine handle it. In effect, the telemarketers stole the use of my own home phone from me. The Indiana no-call list has given it back.

As I understand it, proposed federal laws could once again greatly expand the number and kinds of businesses who could legally call me. How could this possibly be in my best interest?

PLEASE ... Do not enact any federal law that would supersede existing, stricter state laws like Indiana's.
